New Development, Undecided...

Today I wrote a letter to the paper about my feelings about the new development in the neighbourhood, and I'm still feeling undecided.

On one side I like how things are now and I don't want the change. It was 25 years ago when Bruce and I bought our house. It was the only house for a mile. I remember having to walk 20 minutes to my neighbour's house when I needed to borrow milk or eggs. It was a small bungalow, but it was enough. All three of our kids grew up in that house. We loved the neighbourhood, especially since it had such a nice park so close.

I remember taking the kids to the park when they were small. I have so many wonderful memories. We would go on adventures and look for birds.

All the kids are grown up now and they have kids too. Too bad everyone is so far away!

I can't believe how houses are budding up on each side of my house now. So much for having my own space.

If they do put in a community centre, it sure would get me out of the house and doing things. With Bruce gone, I'm so lonely. Not much to do. At least I'd be able to go somewhere to meet some people like me. Cousin Abby tells me all about the exciting things she signed up for at her community centre!

Not really sure what the answer is. Well, that's all for now, and I'm still wondering what this neighbourhood should do.

Feel free to give me your advice!
